

Continuous Project-Altered Daily

"What was beginning to interest me was the possibility of producing spontaneous behaviour within a formal setting."

A desk allows for putting, other than a wall, which requires to hang or to mount. Putting can be done spontaneously, more so than hanging or mounting, which involves tools and a higher degree of planning. Things come onto and leave the desk's surface for various reasons.

The desk will retain what the filter won't let pass through. We can think of filtration in a system of three terms: a matrix that makes the filter, the feed that enters and the residue that remains, each term reflecting on the other two.

There is a leap away from spontaneity when the desk becomes explicitly expressive, or decidedly formalized, as in: put in an art exhibition. Through mounting an extreme camera on a sturdy tripod and precisely framing the desk we can assume a degree of planning that stretches ideas of spontaneity. Planning seeps from the recording machinery onto the thing that is to be recorded, the desk wavers into scenery and landscape.

The Epigraph above is from Yvonne Rainer's memoirs Feelings Are Facts.